Paul could have felt very proud of himself. He was born into a family of good position among the Hebrew people. He had studied the Scriptures and became a Pharisee. In fact, he was so passionate about his religion that he persecuted Christians.

However, he realized that all those things would profit him nothing. He preferred having the power of Christ in his life, even if it meant experiencing pain. He realized he would never come to the point of perfection, but would always need to press on toward the heavenly prize.
